The Role of Agriculture in Development Xinshen Diao, Hazell, P.B.R., Resnick, Danielle, Thurlow, James, 2007 Changes in the global environment have led some to question whether the conventional wisdom on the role of agriculture in economic development is still relevant to Africa today This report critically examines the literature on this issue taking both the conventional and skeptical views into account It complements this review with case studies of five African countries The findings indicate that agricultural growth will play an essential role in promoting overall economic growth and reducing poverty in most of Africa s agrarian based economies This holds true even for countries that have the potential for industrial growth driven by natural resources The results also show that only smallholder food staple and livestock production can generate broadbased agricultural growth By demonstrating that Africa s agricultural and food subsector cannot be bypassed this report contributes to an important ongoing debate in development studies
