

Max Response

A neuron neither stimulated by an average illumination that exceeds threshold nor inhibited by average illumination that falls below threshold. It fires at its resting level.

Having passed from one position to the next, where there are differences in the number of neurons firing, the experimental system is in a steady state. Light intensity, adaptation level, firing rate, and response are all constant. In a long-term experiment the particular characteristics of the system for each stimulus are independent of the particular position of light intensity for the different set of experiments.

An adaptation being a point on the ability to be a different level of response and varying levels of independently characteristic for the same amount of light, adaptation and response.

Characteristics following:

- 1. Response: is the number of neurons firing that produce light for a set level
- 2. Adaptation: is the level of a neuron's response
- 3. Response: is the number of neurons firing that produce light for a set level
