

Patterns of Trade

The two-dimensional world allows the analysis of trade in a system where all the goods of governments are similar. Economists trade goods for the benefit of their own countries. Over the long run, there have been various trade agreements, with significant changes during the 1990s. Examples of these include the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) and World Trade Organization (WTO) in the 1990s, and the European Union (EU) and the Free Trade Area of the Americas (FTAA) since 2000.

However, there are some challenges in economic analysis that cannot be solved by the two-dimensional world. For example, in Figure 5.1, the production curve represents the domestic supply response to the increasing demand for exports. Economists will also consider the domestic supply curve, which is a function of the domestic supply response to the increasing demand for exports. In this case, the domestic supply curve is a function of the domestic supply response to the increasing demand for exports. The domestic supply curve is a function of the domestic supply response to the increasing demand for exports. The domestic supply curve is a function of the domestic supply response to the increasing demand for exports.
