Other people often criticize the company, criticizing our marketing as ineffective. These critics provide an important warning that if we ignore their advice, we will lose our customers. As a result, we should follow their advice, which would ensure our continued success. Some people suggest that instead of following the critics' advice, we should focus more on building our brand. This strategy would require substantial resources to advertise, which is especially costly if we are already advertising extensively. In fact, our marketing budget is already stretched. This evidence provides sufficient support to identify advertising with critics as being important. In addition, by following the critics' advice, we should be able to more fully support our brand.

Look at the cartoon, showing arguments about tracking effects of a space program.

Readers often criticize advertisements that give arguments about what factor the benefits of a new technology depend on. Do you think the arguments about tracking effects of a space program are convincing? Why or why not?
