

Lab 52: Fertilization and Early Development

Introduction

Fertilization is the process by which the nuclei of an egg and a sperm cell fuse together to form a new cell, the zygote. This process is essential for the development of a new organism.

During fertilization, the egg and sperm cells fuse together to form a zygote. The egg cell is haploid (2n) and the sperm cell is haploid (n). The zygote is diploid (2n) and contains the genetic material of both parents. The zygote then undergoes cleavage to form a morula, which is a ball of cells. The morula then develops into a blastocyst, which is a hollow sphere of cells. The blastocyst implants itself in the uterine wall and begins to divide, forming the embryo.

Embryonic development is the process by which the embryo develops into a fetus. This process is characterized by rapid cell division and differentiation. The embryo is initially a simple ball of cells, but it soon begins to form the basic structures of the body, such as the head, tail, and limbs.
