innate and adaptive immunity:

- innate immunity: series of defenses that are triggered by the detection of certain types of molecules in the body
 - act immediately upon infection
 - the SAME whether or not the pathogen has been encountered before
 - two strategies
 - external barriers (skin, acidic environments, secretions, mucous, hairs, cilia)
 - non-specific internal defenses (phagocytic cells, defensive proteins, inflammatory response)
 - "body guards": effective against small intruders but can't stand up to sophisticated attack
 - phagocytic cells: patrol the body and eat diseased, damaged, and foreign cells/particles (can trigger helper T-cells to mount an adaptive immune response)
 - incapable of dealing with a specific attack
 - interferons: proteins produced by virus-infected cells, that help to limit the cell-to-cell spread of viruses
 - stimulate neighboring non-infected cells to produce antiviral proteins
 - some infections will trigger the release of proteins that alert cells to the presence of the invader
- adaptive immunity: can target a specific pathogen very effectively and remember the pathogen (leads to much more effective defenses in the future)
 - molecular recognition: the ability of the body to recognize the presence of something that does not belong (ignoring things that do belong)
 - involves the recognizes and categorize a huge variety of molecules and develop recognition of, and responses to, new molecules that enter the body.
 - antigen: any molecule that stimulates and adaptive immune recognition response
 - antibody: custom-made protein that specifically binds and stimulates a response to a specific antigen (your body makes many different antibodies to deal with different conditions)
