

The male genitalia

- Structures include the penis and scrotum externally
- The testis, epididymis and vas deferens internally

Penis

- Composed of 3 columns of erectile tissue: 2 corpora cavernosa (dorsally) and corpus spongiosum (ventrally)
- At the distal end of the shaft the corpus spongiosum expands into a cone of erectile tissue, the glans
- The shaft is the corona
- The urethra transverses the corpus spongiosum and its meatus forms a slit at the glans tip
- Foreskin: over the glans the skin folds in and back on itself forming a hood or flap
- Frenulum: fold of the foreskin extending from the urethral meatus ventrally

Scrotum

- Loose protective sac and continuation of the abdominal wall
- The scrotal wall consists of thin skin lying in folds called rugae
- Cremaster muscle controls the size of the scrotum by responding to ambient temperature, this is to keep the testes at the best temperature for producing sperm: 3 C
- When it is cold the cremaster muscle contracts raising the sac and bringing the testes closer to the body to absorb heat necessary for sperm viability
- Inside a septum separates the sac into 2 halves in each scrotal half is a testis which produces sperm
- Each testis is oval shaped and compressed laterally, and suspended vertically by the spermatic cord, the left testis is lower than the right because the left's spermatic cord is longer
