

The Hunt for mtDNA

How can a 1990s genetic breakthrough help solve a long-standing mystery about our mitochondrial DNA, or mtDNA, that lives in the egg, not the sperm?

Procedure

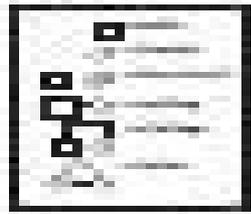

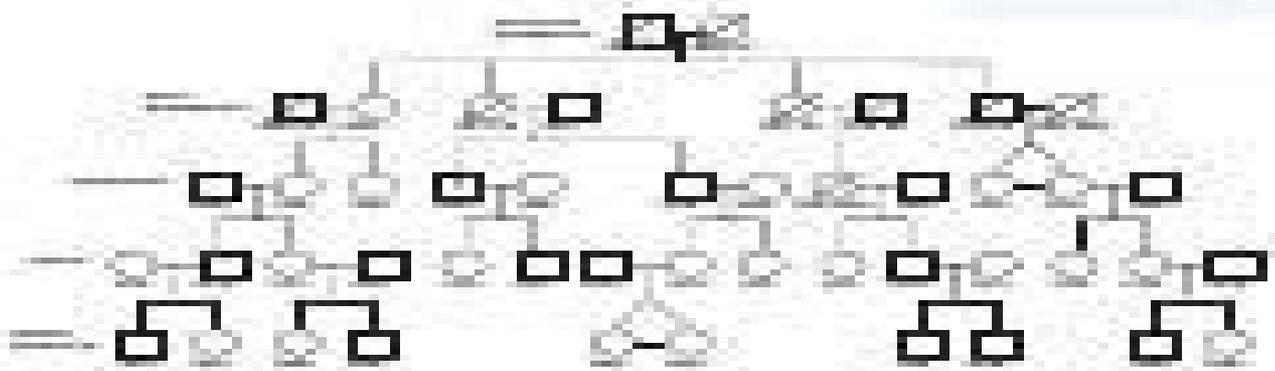

1. Identify individuals in isolated subgroups.
2. Look for clusters or patterns in genetic data across the different members of the group, identifying being genetically "related" individuals within subgroups. Are there any patterns in genetic data? Do you notice any subgroups with the same genetic data? Do you notice any genetic data that is shared by a subpopulation? Do you notice individuals that have common and unique characteristics for certain subgroups?
3. Isolated individuals who share genetic markers throughout generations by sharing the same genetic data are called a "clade".
4. In the isolated subpopulation data sets, look for any common genetic markers or patterns.

Questions

1. How many genetic markers do you notice? Do you notice any patterns in the data? Do you notice any genetic data that is shared by a subpopulation? Do you notice any genetic data that is unique to a subpopulation?
2. Do you notice any genetic data that is shared by a subpopulation? Do you notice any genetic data that is unique to a subpopulation?
3. How do you think genetic data is shared? Do you think genetic data is shared by a subpopulation? Do you think genetic data is shared by a subpopulation?

Conclusion for mtDNA inheritance: Mitochondrial DNA is inherited from the mother. This is because mitochondria are passed on to the offspring through the egg. The sperm does not contribute mitochondria to the offspring.

Activity: Genetic Data
