

Chapter 6 Section 2

Executive Powers

As chief executive the president has three main powers. These are: appointment and removal of key executive branch officials, issuing executive orders, and maintaining executive privilege.

Appointment and Removal Powers

The Constitution gives the president power to appoint people to fill the top posts in the executive branch. About one-third of presidential appointments must be approved by the Senate. A president can remove any appointee, with the exception of federal judges, from a position at any time.

Executive Orders

As chief executive, presidents also have the power to issue, or make, executive orders—a formal rule or regulation instructing executive branch officials on how to carry out their jobs. Executive orders have the force of law. Presidents also occasionally issue signing statements, which declare how a president intends to enforce a law.

Executive Privilege

The final power that presidents claim as chief executive is the right of executive privilege. This power allows a president to refuse to release information to Congress or a court. They use this power to shield information in the interest of national security. They also say that by guaranteeing confidentiality, they can get better feedback from their advisers. In most cases, the courts have agreed with the concept.

Diplomatic and Military Powers

The president is foreign policy leader, chief of state, and the commander in chief of the United States. These roles give the president wide diplomatic and military powers.

Diplomatic Powers

The president has the power to negotiate treaties with foreign governments. Two-thirds of the Senate must approve any treaty. Even after a treaty is approved, Congress can still pass laws that change or override parts of it.

Presidents can also make executive agreements—agreements between a president and the head of a foreign government. Executive agreements have the force of law and do not require Senate approval.

The president also has the power to formally recognize the legitimacy of a foreign government. This power is known as diplomatic recognition.
