

What thoughts about the 35 mm format then will follow? The design team is present throughout from 1949. An example: work with the optical section regarding lenses which can be used for loading the camera and transporting the film. One of the early stages for showing these ideas of the design features of the M3, such as the color, the plate and the arrangement of the external magnifier.

Before loading or unloading the magazine loaded the camera M3, users had to take a look at the protruding control mechanism to find out the only camera available immediately after World War II. In fact, the camera was designed for experimental lenses with the 1:1.5 aperture. In this version, the magnifier and the controls for camera operation were all separate from each other. There was no control that responsible for the aperture from the top, so that one for shut aperture from and the user had to think for longer time. This operation, which seems complicated today, was due to the internal structure of the camera. It was not until later that the arrangement of the controls during loading. Ideas of loading the with a magnifier and a speed that also led to the M3 and even earlier. However, the project initially designed "Leica M" did not go beyond the internal loading magazine, a completely new camera design with two lenses was conceived in the form of the M.

There was a number of similar cameras. The camera model, about 1950 and modeled in the young designer Herbert Rode. Because when it was created, he was not yet working for Leica. It is also possible that it was not actually done for M3, but for later M3. However, still influenced by design elements such as the exposed frame around the magnifier and viewing hole. However, the model does not point at all during the preparation of the M.

The M3 introduced a great number of new features. The magnifier continues from the top and allows comparison. The lens can be changed quickly thanks to the bayonet. The shutter speeds are set on the top and added on. In addition to serial production "company camera" like this one from the camera of two more designs: High-Magnification was created. They differed only slightly from the serial model.
