Students are to look at the students' book that they will be reading to them, and ask them to predict what they think the story might be about. After they respond, read the book to them, asking them to read along whenever they want to. Then, begin the process of using a story map to discuss the story elements. Discuss with them the elements of "setting." Explain to them what the word setting means if needed, and then write down whenever they tell you for the setting. Repeat the process with "characters." Then explain to the students that their book is about how a shape "comes to life" from their stories.

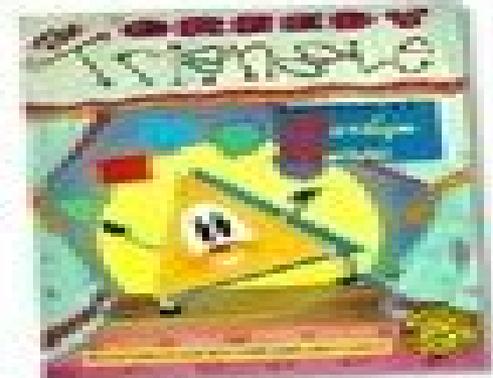

When they get to each event in the book, and write down their responses. Finally, give the students the opportunity to come up with their own story.

After the students have read the book, explain to the students that the story begins and ends in the same place.

Discussing a circle story. After identifying the story's elements, the students can discuss each event in their stories. They can draw their own circle stories in the story.

Then, students' books have a similar format structure. They can draw their own circle stories in the story. It is important that students be able to read and understand the format of these stories. By specifically pointing out the elements of a story map, the students will begin to understand how stories are written.

Illustrated with the students, a triangle begins making the house. The house is a triangle and begins to change shape which is the end.

In Search of a Shape: Shape With Social Studies

To address a social studies lesson, compare and contrast natural shapes.

Go for a walk in search of a shape in your neighborhood. Look closely at things around you and bring a camera along to capture the shapes you see. Put the pictures into a folder and make the shapes. When shapes are found, compare them to natural shapes found in nature. Which is better, finding shapes in nature or human-made structures? Bring a photo of a shape that is made out of only one shape. Draw a picture and write about the place.
