The Dangers of Trash in the Ocean

The greatest threat to our planet is the fact that humans still waste so much. Every day, billions of people are responsible for throwing away about 4 million tons of garbage. And it is not just our waste that is a problem. It is also the waste that other people are throwing away. It is a problem because people all over the world are throwing away trash in the water. Other people are throwing away trash in the water. Other people are throwing away trash in the water.

When trash reaches the ocean, it affects marine animals in many harmful ways. For example, many animals are dying because they are ingesting plastic. Other animals have been badly injured that have died on separate occasions. And when investigations, many pounds of plastic were found on their stomachs. Others have been seen flailing about because of fishing gear, plastic products and various other debris that they have ingested. Animals and other creatures regularly get caught in and entangled in fishing gear, which can lead to starvation or drowning. Additionally, seabirds consume plastic, sometimes mistaking it for food. This often results in death. According to National Geographic, many of these animals often mistake plastic bags for jellyfish in the open ocean and die trying to eat them. Recently, a study revealed that 90% of seabirds feed their young with plastic.

As you read, think about the ways that people in our world are responsible for the trash that is in the ocean. How can we reduce the amount of trash that we throw away? How can we make sure that the trash that we do throw away is recycled? How can we make sure that the trash that we do throw away is not in the ocean?
