

FEATURES AND STRUCTURE OF A CRITIQUE PAPER

What Is a Critique?

A critique is a form of academic writing that critically evaluates a work or text. A critique, similar to most other forms of academic writing, uses formal academic language and has a clear structure, that is, an introduction, body, and conclusion. The body of the critique includes a brief summary of the work being critiqued and the critical evaluation of the work.

The purpose of a critique is to gauge the usefulness or contribution of the work to its field. Writing a critique will also help us develop a further understanding of the work's subject area and any related fields. It will also help us understand the purpose, intended audience, development of argument, structure of evidence, and creative style of a work. We will also be able to gauge the work's strengths and weaknesses: which parts were effective or useful and which parts were lacking.

TIP:

A critique can be used to analyze any number of works and texts. These include, but are not limited to, novels, movies, poems, journal articles, news reports,

How to Critique

Before starting on your critique, it is ideal to already have a clear understanding of the work that you are critiquing. Be sure to first study the work being discussed. Identify its thesis statement or main idea, and find the key evidence or elements used to support it. Also, take note of how the work connects to a broader issue or context. What field is it in? What does it hope to contribute? How is it connected to a bigger issue, either in its discipline or in the world in general?

When we critique, what should we watch out for? Analyze the categories of content, organization, style, and correctness.

In content, consider the topic. Is it an appropriate, important, or interesting study, especially considering the field it is in? Is it broad or specific? How is the topic developed? Are its arguments clear enough? Does it have sufficient examples and evidence?

For organization, look at how the work is begun and concluded. Are the introduction and conclusion talking about the same idea, thus properly framing the thesis statement or main idea? Is the thesis, if applicable, in an easily identifiable
