

THEORY AND MANAGEMENT OF NERVE CELLS — ANSWER KEY

1. Which submembrane region and processes allow communication signal to travel rapidly? (2 marks) Myelinated segments (axons) and nodes of Ranvier.

a. A dendrite can be up to 100 micrometers long and is the extension of the cell body.

b. A central axon hillock initiates action potentials that proceed. Action potentials propagate distally & eventually reach either axon terminals (synapses) where they signal the next cell.

a. These channels cause a Ca^{2+} spike that helps drive the action potentials and a long (slow) depolarizing potential (D) called the burst.

b. These waves travel backward until they reach the cell body. These waves are backpropagated, causing a net increase in the applied potential at the cell body. What is the change in the fast A membrane?

a. Backpropagation is the continuation of depolarizing wave. At the cell body it produces the depolarized membrane of the cell body itself.

2. Which of the following would be most likely to change the speed of the action potential? (2 marks)

a. A shorter membrane resistance of the axon terminals. This is the opposite of what would cause a spike.

b. An increase in the membrane resistance of the axon hillock. This is the opposite of what would cause a spike. This is the opposite of what is causing the action potential.

a. Many more channels would conduct toward the axon hillock. This would slow the propagation of the action potential. Increasing the length of the axon would slow the action potential.

b. A higher membrane resistance would slow the action potential. This is the opposite of what is causing the action potential.

a. Which region of the cell body is the most likely to be the site of the action potential? (2 marks)
