The Dangers of Trash in the Ocean

The greatest threat to our planet is the fact that humans still waste so much. Every day, billions of people are responsible for throwing away about 4 million tons of garbage. And it is not just our waste that is a problem. It is also the waste of other animals. There is a massive problem in the ocean because people all over the world are throwing a lot of trash in the water. Other major types of trash are continuously thrown up to the beach.

When trash reaches the ocean, it affects marine animals in many harmful ways. For example, many animals use shiny things like pieces of plastic or metal that have been thrown away as food. They do not know that these items are dangerous. They also often get stuck on separate occasions, and when investigations find pieces of plastic were found on their stomachs. Others have found sea turtles dead because of fishing gear, plastic products and various other trash that they have ingested. Animals and other creatures regularly get caught in and eat new fishing gear, which can lead to starvation or drowning. Additionally, seabirds consume plastic, sometimes mistaking it for food. This often results in death. According to National Geographic, many of these animals often mistake plastic bags for jellyfish in the open ocean, and many fish are regularly found dead while feeding on a fisherman's trash over 100 miles out at sea.

Animals in and around the ocean are negatively affected by plastic waste. Another reason that this trash is so harmful to humans is because it can also be harmful to humans. While some have thought that plastic would only decompose through temperatures, it does not. It is actually stronger than steel. It does not decompose even in the warm sun. When this plastic breaks...
