Abstract

For more than 50 years, NOAA's environmental satellites have been an integral key to life-saving weather and climate forecasts for the United States. NOAA, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, has a rich history of successfully operating geostationary operational environmental satellites (GOES) and polar-orbiting environmental satellites (POES) that have helped take some of the mystery out of atmospheric phenomenon. Through the years, NOAA, with cooperation with NASA, has developed increasingly advanced satellites that have provided higher spatial and temporal resolution images, operational soundings, atmospheric temperature and moisture data in all weather situations. During those 46 years, NOAA has also built strong partnerships within the U.S. and throughout the world, leading to satellite-data sharing agreements that will strengthen the scientific community's understanding of the world's changing climate. The article, History of the NOAA Satellite Program, traces the development of the U.S. weather satellite system from an early commitment in 1953 by the Eisenhower administration to hoist an Earth satellite in orbit in 1958, to the next generation polar-orbiting system, the Joint Polar Satellite System (JPSS).

1. Introduction

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's (NOAA) satellite program has stood watch over the American public and partner nations for more than four decades developing and applying space based Earth remote sensing for NOAA's National Weather Service (NWS) forecasts. The NWS is responsible for weather warning services (the geostationary satellites) and their global forecasts (the polar program). NOAA's satellite operations grew out of the early space program and the desire to study our Earth from a vantage point high in the sky. Over the past half century, NOAA's satellites have evolved from weather satellites to environmental satellites. Data is used for applications related to the oceans, coastal regions, agriculture, detection of forest fires, detection of volcanic ash, monitoring the ozone hole over the South Pole, and the space environment. As NOAA has evolved from weather only sensing to environmental sensing, it has aligned about strategic themes. Current and future generations of satellites support all of the NOAA's strategic goals.

- . Protect restore and manage the use of coastal and ocean resources through an ecosystems approach to management
- . Support society's needs for weather and water information
