

Genes Mendel's 2nd Generation

Background: This laboratory investigates a monohybrid cross between two pea plants of different colors. The two different colors used in this experiment are the following: purple and the complementary color is yellow for Table 1 below.

There are two gene phenotypes for the above pair of genetic cross. Purple (P) is purple (p). These two gene phenotypes are produced by the following pair of heterozygous genes (P & p) located on two pairs of chromosomes. View gene pairs

Parental Cross

P = Purple

Recessive Cross

p = Yellow

Table 1 shows a monohybrid cross between two heterozygous parents (P & p). The combination of two genes can result in two different phenotypes. The combination of genes that is most frequent is heterozygous (Pp) and the recessive (pp) is the least frequent. The combination of two genes that result in the same phenotype is called a monohybrid cross. The combination of two genes that result in different phenotypes is called a dihybrid cross.
