

Patterns of Trade

The two-dimensional model allows the analysis of trade in a system where all the goods of a country are traded. Economists have generally been skeptical of this view of trade. One of the first to question this view was Alfred Marshall in his well-known classic Principles of Economics. Examples of Marshall's views include the famous “diamonds and water” paradox and the “theory of the diamond” paradox (see Figure 5.1).

However, Marshall’s criticisms of the two-dimensional model were not based on the model itself, but rather on the data used to build it. Later, product-line research by Economists like Jacques Viner and the “new trade theory” developed by Richard R. Anderson suggests that Marshall’s criticisms are unfounded. The research suggests that countries specialize because they are willing and able to produce all the other goods. If there were no international trade, countries like the United States would produce diamonds and water. If international trade is possible, it would be produced only by diamond mines.

International Trade

As shown in this two-dimensional model, the total supply for diamonds in the domestic market is higher than the domestic supply. At price P_1 and quantity Q_1 , there are 100 domestic units of diamonds available and 100 units. Also at P_1 , domestic diamonds production is 100 and foreign production is producing 100. Thus, diamonds there are produced by two different countries, which would produce diamonds but export the diamonds.
