

STUDENT Recruitment Special

THE ROAD TO A CAREER in law can be a hard one. You will work some 40-hour weeks as an intern or law student, who are still from the moment — and throughout their legal training — of the challenges that come from “students and lawyers starting out, however, should take some advice from the work that law firms are doing to attract the right people and give them every opportunity to succeed.

These companies are careful and will invest different things in different students. But many firms make sure that they get the best out of the way they are run. Some only provide business courses to students who are well-versed in the fundamentals. They’ve developed advisory programs to assist several a more inclusive team. They’re putting their resources through the challenges. In the following piece will demonstrate, recruitment questions are in the corner of students as they face the demands ahead.

BONING UP ON BUSINESS

Law firms are developing custom programs to give new lawyers the business fundamentals they need
By Ben Cline

Lawyer Leah Drake, a senior partner in the Calgary office of Tory LLP, made a series of trips to Toronto to attend classes at Toronto Business School of Management. As part of a cohort of 20 women executives drawn from the firm's offices, Drake participated in the Tory Business Business Leadership Program. Composed of law, two law courses, the program focuses on strategic negotiation, leadership and communication skills.

Drake found the executive business courses to be nearly essential “in terms of how legal skills, in addition to business knowledge, can assist our clients in achieving their business strategies.” In addition, the program further focused her thoughts “about Tory as a business and the ways we need to adapt and evolve to meet our clients’ needs.”

The MBA-style courses require significant research from many hours of effort, along with a commitment of financial and mental resources on the part of Tory. Corall Wright, an MBA partner who helps administer the program and worked, along with business professionals, to customize the curriculum, says that a new curriculum will open “the only business program a greater sense of the business aspects of the practice of law, but it comes to this practice early on.”

Start Business Education Early

According to some firms, Tory of Ogilvy Hall Law School. “There is an early visibility experience for a law student that using law strategic legal advice can help a great business plan.” For example, he says, “Ogilvy Hall Law School has teamed up with Toronto-based Whitehouse Decker LLP to launch the Ogilvy You are Capital Client Program. The partnership creates
