

Bunyip

VOICE
The following call of the Bunyip can be heard in Tasmania, like a great booming coming from the water.

BODY
Although water bound, some sightings of the Bunyip report it to be dark and hairy, at least the size of a wolf. Others say it is covered in scales.

HAIR
In some descriptions, the Bunyip has only a single spine to form its head, so when it has two eyes that stare like the hole to hell.

CLAW
Bunyip has sharp clawed hands, which help it to climb out of the swampy bays and even allow it to drag itself up trees.

Native Australians have many tales of a water monster called Bunyip. It lives in swamps, billabongs, and other still inland waters, and many times keeps to itself if it is left alone. However, it should not be disturbed, especially if it has a Bunyip cub to protect. It has the power to swell the waters to cover even the highest points on land, and to wash over the tops of trees. It can turn humans into black swans, or change women into beautiful water spirits who can tempt men to their death with their songs of love.

A man from the Ilog tribe was hunting in the region while his car waited on the bank. Suddenly a Bunyip rose from the waters and dragged off the boy in his long arms. Every day the man returned and laid traps as bait to catch the Bunyip. Then one night the Bunyip appeared, and the man saw his car under its spell. He reached out to his son, but he became trapped, too. At last, a great storm blew up and broke the spell, and since then the tribe have never lost the boys that helped trap Bunyip.

ACTUAL SIZE

WHERE IN THE WORLD?

Many tales of Bunyip are told across all of Australia. In Tasmania, it is also called Good Hope and Universal Eye.

DID YOU KNOW?

- If a Bunyip cub is taken by humans, the mother will make all the waters rise and pour into the forest until she gets her child back. Sometimes it calls. The waters can climb hills and cover trees.
- A Bunyip's spell spreads around it in a circle, and attracts anyone who gets too close.
- "Sightings" of the Bunyip are still reported to this day. Some describe it as a large dog-like creature, while others say it has a very long neck. Sometimes it has hoofs, flippers, or feathers, or looks like a horse.
- Many Bunyip sightings are thought to be people falling from the trees. It is easy to fall in deserted water holes, and anyone coming up for air would be a strange sight, covered in dirt and weeds.
