

Big Business

By Randy Skretvedt

"Big Business" is regarded today as the greatest of all the Laurel and Hardy silent comedies. That may be open to debate, but there's no disputing that it is a beautifully constructed comedy. Based on a very slight premise, the film's one basic gag is sustained and built, with the tempo gradually building to a frenzy. Stan and Ollie are Christmas tree salesmen in sunny California. They have been angrily rebuffed by two would-be customers (one wielding a hammer) when they meet a particularly surly prospect (Finlayson). A simple argument escalates into a full-scale war, as the boys destroy Fin's house and its furnishings, while he demolishes their car and merchandise. A burly cop halts the fracas; Stan's gesture of apology to the homeowner is a cigar—which gives the boys the winning salvo in the war when it explodes.

Although many writers have stated that this film takes place in the summertime, it was actually shot from December 19 through December 26, 1928, at the start of a typically sunny Southern California winter. The studio was eager to get the film finished, before closing on December 29 for the installation of sound-recording equipment. (Admittedly, the idea of selling Christmas trees in the summer sounds like something Stan and Ollie would do, and in 1964 even Stan Laurel believed that this idea was part of the film when describing it in a phone call to an admirer. "Who in the hell would buy a Christmas tree in July?," he asked. "That was the humor in it.") Most of "Big Business" is taken up with what the team's official biographer, John McCabe, called a "reciprocal destruction" battle, in which each of the combatants deliberately and politely allows the other to take his turn in destroying his opponent's property.

This device had been used in Laurel and Hardy's earlier comedies "Hats Off" (where the primary objects being destroyed, or thrown, were hats), "The Battle of the Century" (pies), "You're Dam Tootin'" (trousers), "The Finishing Touch" (rocks), "Two Tars" (automobiles) and "Should Married Men Go Home?" (mud), but the device reached its apogee in "Big Business." Although none of the three customers visited by Stan and Ollie is terribly friendly, the prime adversary here is played by bald, squinting James Henderson Finlayson, born in 1887 in Larbert, Stirlingshire, Scotland. He studied business management in college, planning to take over the family iron foundry, but got the acting bug when he met actor-producer John Clyde and his son Andy. Finlayson played on Broadway in 1912, toured in vaudeville, broke into films in 1916, signed with Mack Sennett in 1919, and broadened his horizons by signing with Hal Roach in 1922.
