

A Line in a Plane

Geometry has some basic terms with which you should become familiar. Some of these terms are undefined terms, which means they have no precise explanation or formal definition. "Point," "line," and "plane" are undefined terms. These undefined terms will help us define other words used in geometry. The words for which specific meanings can be given are defined terms.

Points, lines, and planes are part of every geometric figure. A point (represented by a dot) is the basic building block of all geometric figures. A point has no size or shape. In geometry, points are labeled with capital letters. Draw a dot representing a point in the box at the right and label it "A."

A line is like the edge of a desk or ruler. If you can picture BB's in a row, you can begin to picture what a line is. A line consists of continuous points (see Figure 2) but lacks width or height. The only dimension of a line is length—straight and unlimited. A line is named by placing a lower-case letter near the line. In Figure 2 the line is named line l . A line can also be named by any two letters that are points on the line. The symbol \leftrightarrow is placed above the letters to show that the letters represent a line. In Figure 2 we have labeled points A , B , C , and D on the line. Line l can also be named \overleftrightarrow{AB} (read as line AB), \overleftrightarrow{AC} , \overleftrightarrow{AD} , \overleftrightarrow{BC} , \overleftrightarrow{BD} , or \overleftrightarrow{CD} .

You have already learned that a plane is a flat surface. Every geometric figure lies in a plane. A plane is composed of points extending continuously in all directions and can be represented by a shape as in Figure 3. This plane is named by a lower-case letter, p .
