Lab 21: Fluvial Geomorphology and Landforms

Katie Burles and Crystal Huscroft

Water in streams is one of the most widespread and important agents of erosion and deposition on Earth. Flowing water has the ability to free rock material, set it in motion, and then transport materials downstream to depositional environments. These stream-related geomorphic processes produce predictable fluvial landforms. While predictable, these landforms are dynamic and routinely shift over time.

This lab activity provides you with satellite views of fluvial landforms around the world through Google Earth \(Web\). You will demonstrate your understanding of fluvial geomorphology processes and associated landforms by creating an annotated virtual guided fluvial landform tour.
