Chapter 21

Science in context

Learners are asked to suggest the problems of hard water. They may come up with the following suggestions. A few prompts may be necessary if they cannot think of anything.

- Waste of soap. Hard water needs much more soap before it forms a lather. So its cleaning power is reduced because it forms a scum. The scum is calcium salts of the long-chained carboxylic acids such as calcium stearate.
- Solid calcium carbonate ('scale' or 'fur') found in kettles, water pipes and boilers for making hot water does not conduct heat so it wastes energy because more energy is needed to boil water in a kettle or boiler. In boilers and hot water pipes the scale can block the boiler tubes and reduces the flow of hot water. In extreme cases the pressure of the steam in the boiler could build up so much that the boiler explodes.
- Scum marks on clothes. Soap and hard water form a scum. This makes dirty marks when washing clothes in the presence of hard water. Modern washing powders sometimes contain chemicals which reduce this by 'sequestering' the calcium ions. Nylon and silk are especially effected by scum.

Learners are asked to find out about other methods of softening water.

- Distillation. This removes all hardness because the solids remain in the distillation flask and the water that comes over as a distillate is pure.
- Boiling removes temporary hardness (due to calcium hydrogencarbonate) but not permanent hardness (due to calcium sulfate).

- Adding washing soda (sodium carbonate) changes soluble calcium and magnesium salts to insoluble carbonates.

- Slaked lime (calcium hydroxide) is used to soften water in reservoirs. It only removes temporary hardness.

- Aqueous ammonia (which contains hydroxide ions) removes only temporary hardness.

The resin is regenerated by pouring a concentrated aqueous solution of sodium chloride through it. The high concentration of sodium ions shifts the equilibrium to the left so that the calcium ions are released.

Learners may also ask about how water becomes hard in the first place and about the two types of hardness (temporary and permanent).

Carbon dioxide in the air dissolves in rainwater to form a weak acidic solution containing H^+ and HCO_3^- ions. When this rainwater passes through rocks containing calcium or magnesium carbonates, soluble hydrogencarbonates are formed. This is temporary hard water because the hardness can be removed by boiling. When rainwater passes through rocks containing calcium sulfate or magnesium sulfate, a small amount of these compounds dissolve. The hardness in this water cannot be removed by boiling. This is permanently hard water.
