Abstract. Research studies have generally focused only on VR learning's advantages and the introduction of learning content through VR, rather than providing useful information to support educators in integrating VR into their classrooms. In this work-in-progress paper, we aim to determine what preparations should be considered and organized as a VR-based learning arrangement. The Technological Pedagogical Content Knowledge (TPACK) framework is a useful lens that provides insight on how to successfully implement VR in the classroom. Through a literature review of research studies, we identify considerations teachers and instructors should consider before implementing VR in their classrooms. Aligned with the TPACK framework's Technological Knowledge (TK) and Technological Pedagogical Knowledge (TPK) areas, VR features such as demanding a high quantity of data and enough space require teachers and instructors to prepare sufficient internet connection, batteries, individual physical spaces and prior experience as TK components. Similarly, VR experiences depend on personal activities, and the arrangement of educational goals, assessment systems and applications for the classroom's diversity is crucial.

Keywords: Virtual Reality (VR), Technological Pedagogical Content Knowledge (TPACK), Arrangement.

1 Introduction

Due to the adverse effects of COVID-19, teachers and instructors had to seek a replacement of the traditional learning system with alternative new technologies. Virtual Reality (VR) - based instruction is a nascent area with tremendous growth in recent years. Huawei's Intelligent World 2030 report predicted that the number of VR and AR users will reach 1 billion by 2030 [1]. VR has recently been applied to teaching several subjects, such as astronomy [2], art history [3], and language learning [4].

To implement VR for students' learning, teachers and instructors must conduct significant preparations before their students' usage. The previous research illustrates that teachers with knowledge of AR/VR-based instruction are highly aware of the usefulness and ease of AR/VR use in teaching and learning [5]. Compared to AR and VR, although AR usually requires smartphones as the device, VR contains various devices. Hayes, Daugherty, & Meng [6] illustrates different VR devices' utilization respectively; thus, preparations for VR are more complicated than AR. On the other hand, many previous kinds of research focused only on VR learning's advantages and the learning through VR [2-4, 7]. In fact, teachers have some concerns about the application of VR in their instruction, especially operational factors and technical support pre-instruction phase and during students' VR play session [8]. Therefore, in this article we aim to determine what preparation should be considered for VR-based learning arrangement. The goal of this review of research also includes support for teachers and instructors' knowledge about VR learning for future integration of VR into their instruction.
