

Unit 2: The Climate of the West

Chapter 1

1. How do the different geographical characteristics of the West affect its climate?

Geography is a crucial factor in determining the climate of any region. The West is no exception. Its location, topography, and proximity to the ocean all play a role in shaping its weather. The West is a vast region, stretching from the Rocky Mountains in the north to the Gulf of California in the south. This diversity of terrain creates a wide range of climates, from the harsh, dry conditions of the desert to the mild, wet weather of the coast. The ocean also has a significant impact, moderating temperatures and bringing in moisture from the south.

2. What is the difference between the continental climate of the West and the maritime climate of the East?

The West is characterized by a continental climate, which is marked by large temperature swings and low humidity. This is due to its inland location and the presence of the Rocky Mountains, which block moisture from the ocean. In contrast, the East has a maritime climate, which is more moderate and humid. This is because the East is closer to the ocean, which helps to regulate temperatures and bring in moisture from the south. The difference between these two climates is a result of the West's unique geographical features.
