1(a) Changes in operations management altered how RDM deals with the HR department, since the HR department now has to recruit new employees with a different skill set. The marketing department has to change its tactics now as well, as RDM no longer sells to the mass market. RDM now serves a niche market and this requires a different strategy for marketing. The marketing department is now also dealing with the customers to help in customizing their products.

(b) Changes to production affected the employees of RDM the most. RDM employed roughly 500 people and was the largest single employer in Lobjanec, and with the switch to automation most of these employees were made redundant due to their jobs ceasing to exist. Thus, the interests of these employees would have been to have RDM keep their job places. The shareholders of the business also have to invest more money in the business since automation is capital intensive. Thus, shareholders will be more interested in the returns of their investments.

2(a) Jan's democratic leadership style is motivating to employees, as they get to have a stake in decision making and to have their thoughts be heard. This boosts the morale of the workforce and brings about job satisfaction. However, such a leadership style can delay decision making due to more people being involved in the process of decision making. This can push back the business in times of emergency when quick decision making is needed.

(b)

3(a) In 1949 following the communist takeover, RDM changed from being a privately owned business to a state-owned business. This meant that RDM owners could no longer gain profit from the business since they hold no power over the business. Then following the velvet revolution, when communism collapsed, RDM changed back to privately owned and with Adriana taking over the CEO of RDM. When Adriana became CEO, she added healthcare devices to their product portfolio. This was as the baby boomer generation was soon to reach retirement age increasing the demand for the health care devices.

(b) Before introducing automation, RDM had a large unionized labour force. This meant that methods to motivate employees would've been limited to extrinsic motivation methods, such as fringe benefits or wages. This is as mass production requires repetitive jobs and has no room for creativity or improvement in their skills. These jobs are usually low-skilled jobs by which the employees would be extrinsically motivated. After introducing automation, RDM changed its labour force to bring a highly skilled and educated workforce that would be more motivated by intrinsic factors, which increases job satisfaction. Extrinsic factors such as financial pay will not motivate the employees, as they are already highly paid since they are highly skilled and they are not as easily available for recruitment.
