

PROBLEMS IN CLASS WITH ANSWERS

What's the relationship between the distance from a wavelength, λ , to a trough or crest of the beam?

The first argument of trigonometry, the cosine function, describes a sine wave. Each wavelength of the sinusoidal wave is 2π radians, or the region from 0 to 2π radians.

The highest frequency electromagnetic waves are in the gamma region. That is, it has the shortest wavelength and greatest energy. The lowest frequency is in the radio region. The waves in between have lower frequencies and longer wavelengths. The visible spectrum is the part of the spectrum between the ultraviolet and infrared.

- The color is shifting towards the shorter end of the spectrum which is violet/blue.
- The color is getting closer to the red end of the spectrum which is red.
- The galaxy's spectrum is shifted towards the red end of the spectrum so the galaxy moving towards us slowly than the galaxy moving away.

On the "Spectral Power-Density Spectrum" page about pulsars, we looked at pulsar frequencies. The change in wavelength in each spectrum is the same but the frequency is the same.

With distance, Doppler shift, the shift that we expect for objects moving away is the same. The waves in the top spectrum are the same wavelength as the waves in the bottom spectrum with distance, the same.

What are the two main ways of getting a spectrum? One is the star's light. The other is the "Doppler shift" graph. The distance to the star is the same as the distance to the galaxy.

- Without the graph, you can't tell a galaxy's distance unless you know the galaxy's distance. The galaxy's distance is the same. The galaxy's distance is the same.

The distance between two stars is the same as the distance between two stars. The distance between two stars is the same as the distance between two stars.

- Without the Doppler shift, you can't tell a galaxy's distance unless you know the galaxy's distance. The galaxy's distance is the same. The galaxy's distance is the same.
- It is necessary to get the distance to the galaxy. The galaxy's distance is the same. The galaxy's distance is the same.
