

PROBLEMS IN CLASS WITH ANSWERS

What's the relationship between the distance from the center of the galaxy, the density of stars, and the rotation speed?

The line represents the relationship between the distance from the center of the galaxy and the rotation speed. The relationship is linear, indicating that the rotation speed increases linearly with distance.

The rotation speed is the tangential velocity of the stars in the galaxy. This is the speed at which the stars are moving in their orbits around the center of the galaxy. The rotation speed is the distance from the center of the galaxy multiplied by the angular velocity of the galaxy.

- The rotation speed is constant, the rotation speed will be constant (which is not what the graph shows).
- The rotation speed is increasing linearly, the rotation speed will be constant (which is not what the graph shows).
- The rotation speed is constant, the rotation speed will be constant (which is not what the graph shows).
- The rotation speed is increasing linearly, the rotation speed will be constant (which is not what the graph shows).

Use the "Speed and Position" graph to determine the rotation speed and angular velocity of the galaxy. The rotation speed is the distance from the center of the galaxy multiplied by the angular velocity.

With distance from the center of the galaxy, the rotation speed is constant. The rotation speed is the distance from the center of the galaxy multiplied by the angular velocity.

What is the rotation speed of the galaxy? Is it increasing or decreasing? What is the angular velocity of the galaxy? Is it increasing or decreasing?

- With distance from the center of the galaxy, the rotation speed is constant (which is not what the graph shows).
- With distance from the center of the galaxy, the rotation speed is increasing (which is not what the graph shows).

The rotation speed is constant, the rotation speed will be constant (which is not what the graph shows).

- With distance from the center of the galaxy, the rotation speed is increasing (which is not what the graph shows).
- With distance from the center of the galaxy, the rotation speed is decreasing (which is not what the graph shows).
