Introduction

Did you know that the biggest barrier to good relationships is HOW you say things? What we call personality conflicts, or "failure to communicate" really involves the use of language in ways that create or invite conflict. Yes, behavior, personality and actions are part of it, but one of the easiest paths to getting along with almost anyone is to change the words and phrases you use. Here's some basic points:

- Language is understood based on what you say and what lies underneath what you say. As a result you can antagonize or insult people without actually using direct insulting language. In fact most relationships crash because of what underlies what's said. For example, saying "Would you like me to repeat what I said one more time?" actually is interpreted as "Either you are stupid or you weren't paying attention".
- People respond as much to what is implied by your words as what you mean by the words. In fact it doesn't matter what YOU mean. What people think you mean IS important.
- Most of us choose ways of saying things that can aggravate or provoke others, particularly when we are upset or under stress.
- It's normal to create conflict with others through less than perfect use of language.
- By becoming more aware of the words we use, and how they affect people, we can improve our ability to get along with others and build better relationships.

The trick in getting along with others is to replace conflict provoking language with language that sounds like you want to cooperate and work WITH the other person. You give less ammunition for people to use when you do this.

Here's What To STOP Saying

Blaming Statements and Questions.

Any comments or questions that are about finding fault or blaming someone are going to provoke defensive reactions or aggressive attacking reactions. Remember that it doesn't matter WHO is at fault. What matters is finding a solution to the issue.

Comments Or Questions That Focus On The Past

One of the best ways to antagonize people is to focus on what cannot be changed — past actions or real or imagined past slights. Again, it doesn't matter what HAS happened, since nobody can change that. What can be done is to focus on the present and future to make sure you solve the problem.

Absolute Words Like "always, never, etc."

The use of absolutes (always, never) almost always provoke conflict and aggression since they are a) usually inaccurate and b) usually blaming. People react to these by defending or attacking.

Attempts to Prove Other Person Wrong

In discussion, it's easy to try to "win" the argument, or get our points heard. Let's face it. We want people to think WE are right. The problem is that if you do that, other people will try to prove YOU are wrong. That creates emotion and hassle.

Attempts To Embarrass or Humiliate

When we get into heated discussions, there's a tendency to embarrass or humiliate, particularly when we ARE right. This never works. Being right is good. Throwing our "rightness" in the face of other people just creates bad feelings.

Using Direct or Implied Commands

Nobody likes to be "told what to do". If you come across as ordering people about, people will be more likely to resist what you have to say. Eliminate anything that sounds like a command or order.

Using Words Like "ought", "should", "must"

Similar to using commands, these words suggest you feel the need to "advise" someone who has not asked for your help. This is annoying and tends to be seen as over-bearing. Again, this just begs people to fight.

Sounding Like You Think You Could Not Possibly Be Wrong

When people think you believe you cannot possibly be wrong, they try really hard to prove you are wrong, by attacking what they see as arrogance. Do not portray yourself as an expert, or infallible.
