

FIREPROOFING CHRISTMAS TREES

By MARTIN LEATHERMAN, associate chemist, Naval Stores Research Division,
Bureau of Agricultural Chemistry and Engineering

A Christmas tree is a serious fire hazard. The risk is especially great where a large tree is used at a public gathering place, such as a school or church.

A freshly cut tree does not ignite easily because of the moisture present; but the moisture soon evaporates, and the tree becomes dry. When a tree is dry, it catches fire easily. This is especially true of Christmas trees because they contain resinous substances that are easily ignited. The Christmas tree can be made practically fire-proof, however, by replacing the moisture with a fire-resisting substance.

A living tree draws up water and dissolved mineral matter from the soil through its roots. If the stem or trunk of the tree is cut off above the ground and the cut end placed in water while the needles or leaves are still able to evaporate water brought to them from the stem, the cut end takes up relatively large quantities of water. This water-absorbing power permits the introduction of dissolved substances into the tree after it has been cut. These circulate through the tree and are carried into the foliage. Certain species of evergreen trees used for Christmas trees, for example the Norway spruce, drop their needles easily. Once the needles have become loosened, they are no longer able to evaporate water brought to them through the stem, and the tree as a whole loses its power to take up a flameproofing solution. The needles of other species, for example certain pines, are not dropped so readily, and these trees appear to retain their power to evaporate moisture for long periods after cutting. With any given species the length of time after cutting during which the tree will retain its ability to absorb water or solution will vary with the conditions to which it has been subjected, such as exposure to wind, high temperature, and sunlight.

Fire-Resisting Chemicals

Certain chemicals render wood, pine needles, and other flammable materials resistant to fire. Ammonium sulfate is about the best. It is cheap, effective, and easily obtained. Calcium chloride is also effective and cheap, but not so readily obtained in a small quantity as ammonium sulfate. The fire-resisting quality of calcium chloride lies in its capacity to hold water. This characteristic makes it ineffective when the air in a room is very dry.

Ammonium sulfate can be bought from most stores that sell seeds and fertilizers. Usually this material contains impurities that cause the solution to appear turbid or muddy, but this does not render it unfit for use. Calcium chloride is usually sold only in 100-
