

Chapter 3: Creating Anglo-America (1660-1750)

---

The Mercantilist System:

England tried to acquire control of Atlantic commerce, strengthen its hold on North America's eastern coast, and exercise more control over its empire as the New World turned into a battlefield in the never-ending struggles for riches and power among European nations. The colonies had the potential to be a significant source of revenue for the home nation by the middle of the seventeenth century. The dominant view, known as mercantilism, holds that economic activity should be regulated by the government to strengthen national authority. Through unique rewards, monopolies, and other strategies, it should promote production and trade. Above all, commerce ought to be regulated to ensure that the country receives more gold and silver than it exports. To put it another way, exports of commodities, which brought in money from outside, ought to surpass imports, which necessitated paying foreigners for their goods. According to the mercantilist perspective, the colonies' duty was to advance the interests of the mother nation by generating marketable raw resources and importing domestically produced commodities. A significant essay published in 1664 by a London businessman claimed that "foreign trade" was the foundation of "England's treasure." The cornerstone of the empire was commerce, not the exploitation of neighboring lands. The first Navigation Act was enacted by Parliament in 1651 under Oliver Cromwell to reclaim control of international commerce away from the Dutch, whose merchants benefited from unrestricted trade with all nations and all established empires. In 1660 and 1663, more precautions were implemented. Mercantilism, a new economic strategy adopted by England, was based on the notion that the country should control all revenues generated by its empire.

The Conquest of New Netherland:

Charles II's accession to the throne in 1660 marked the restoration of the English monarchy and the beginning of a new era of colonial expansion. The Royal African Company, which was given a monopoly over the slave trade, was one of the new commercial businesses that the government created. The number of English colonies in North America quadrupled in a single generation. New Netherland was the first territory to fall under English rule; it was taken in 1664 as part of an Anglo-Dutch conflict that also saw England capture control of Dutch commercial outposts in Africa. James, the Duke of York, the younger brother of Charles II, was given "full and absolute power" to rule the colony as he saw fit. (Therefore, the colony was given the name New York.) New Netherland has never truly been a part of the vast Dutch empire. The Dutch struggled to defend their possessions in South America, Asia, and Africa, but they gave up New Netherlands without a fight in 1664. This little military station was developed during the English administration into a significant imperial outpost, a seaport that traded with the Caribbean and Europe, and a base for military operations against the French. When the English took over, there were around 9,000 Europeans living in New York. By 1685, there were 20,000 of them.
